

The Seven Deadly Sins

“Six born with human nature. One created by humanity. Four are evolving.”

The 7 deadly sins are humans' greatest enemies. The very basic thing that separates us from being whole perfection. From being holy as the lord almighty.

Human sins are tools meant to test humans in their lives, whatever challenge or struggle they might face. It is a mechanism designed by the Almighty to bring out the best or worst in us. Without them, what would our world look like? Peaceful? Crime-less? Perhaps. But that won't make humans prove to themselves and to the Almighty that they are worthy to enter heaven. It is a question most probably asked. That is also a question humans will never get the answer to. The Almighty's ways are mysterious, and we cannot understand why evil is required for a race to exist. Is it necessary to have it among us? For what purpose? Is evil required to restore some balance to the world? For every goodness, there is a weakness or comfort? Is that bad to have those? What would it make our world be like if our sins ceased to exist? Evil comes in many forms that are not just the 7 deadly sins. Should we expect to see a lesser evil in our world if sins were gone? Would those who were meant to be evil stop the evil coming from others and within themselves?

In order to fully trying to understand the purpose of our sins and their existence. We must dive into what each one's purpose is to shape a human person's life to be. Perhaps it is to make one a better person? Teach him valuable lessons in life about struggle and rewards? Or is it to create a balance between good and evil? For every good, there can't be only good. Evil must exist somewhere. Not even sin is evil, although evil can mean a lot of things depending on perspective. Some find certain sins as the source of evil, driven by evil, or feeding evil. Some do not.

Pride

Pride is a sin that is rooted in human ego. Its purpose is to trigger moments where we feel pride when achieved something. But how can people know when pride is justified or not? When an Olympic athlete wins a gold medal, they feel pride. Is that a good thing? Or a bad thing? Does it make them arrogant? Does it feed a source of evil into them? Would they feel they are superior to others and treat others disrespectfully? But what if none of these questions are true? What if winning a gold medal after working so hard for, meant something for that athlete? Like this is his reward for struggling for so long to get to this point and earn a gold medal. But is it, though?

In human nature, humans always feel that when doing something good or fulfilling their achievements, they will get something in return. But waiting for something to return to you as a reward, is that a bad thing? Would a person help a homeless man and expect to receive a reward later? What if he knew a reward might never come? Most people will agree that Olympic athletes have it different. It could be true, but we never know what each individual thinks. Some may do it for being the best at what they do. Some do it for the fame. But the real question is, do they really need a gold medal for that?

What is the purpose of being great at sports? Health? Fun? Hobby? Work? If an athlete wants to prove something to himself, he can just do it; a gold medal will only show that you were better than others. If an athlete wants to see if he can run 10 miles, he sure can do it without the Olympic Games. So why do it? Why earn the gold medal? To stand in the 1st place and raise his trophy high?

Is it for him? Or to be praised by millions? Pride is a tricky sin that crawls its way through us, manipulates us to believe that sometimes it's justified to be proud, and expects rewards later in return. When it comes to self-growth, it literally means “self”. It does not mean grow among others, and never expect a reward for doing something that made you feel proud, like a good deed, be proud of self being a good person.

Pride is also evolving with human evolution. Humans today created competition. IQ tests, countries' competition in math, chess, Nobel prizes, etc.

Back in ancient times, those things existed too. But not for everything. We created competition in almost everything possible. From educational to warfare. This creates more competitive people who are driven by ego and pride to achieve rewards.

Life is also considered a competition. Finish school by 17, finish college by 23, get married by 25, have a child by 30.

Wrath

Wrath is a destructible sin. It can change a person and affect their life dramatically if not kept under control. Wrath is a born sin, as it comes from human emotions. Meaning there is a purpose for it. Why do we need to get angry? Rage over someone or something? Is that a good thing? Is it part of a divine test by the Almighty? Wrath reflects 2 perspectives on itself. One is a destructible sin. The other is a necessary rage kept under control when required for action. Let's explore these 2 perspectives.

The sin, wrath, makes us lose control over something or someone. Whenever we see that things didn't go well, or were used against us. When this happens, a person is drowning in their thoughts. Unable to control their emotions. Sometimes, no thought is running through their minds. It's just empty, like that person is no longer themselves for a short time of wrath taking over, consuming them. Wrath is like a silent demon. It can take hold of someone and make them do anything bad in a short period of time. When rage rises, the demon rises, and the person is submerged. No one really feels they are losing themselves. It happens so fast. It's like the mind is turning itself off. Like a moment forgotten. Even when you can still remember what happened. This is where the unconscious mind comes in.

Our unconscious mind is where our shadow lives. Another projection of ourselves with all our deep desires, secrets, and flaws. The hidden, raw part of ourselves, as Carl Jung said. The shadow is the one that steps out of its shadows and takes over for a brief moment before retreating back in.

The shadow can appear in many moments in our lives without us realizing it. When having sex with a woman, men allow themselves to behave like simps, dogs, uncontrolled, lustful beings. When fighting someone we hate, we don't want to just humiliate them; we want to hurt them, destroy them, possibly even kill them. The shadow simply uncovers all our hidden desires and secrets. But how does wrath come into this?

The shadow is a part of ourselves that we hide from the world. A being not favored or liked by others. So we are basically living half of our personality during our lifetime. The shadow is not one with us, for it is being separated from us and kept in the unconscious mind. Whenever wrath is triggered in a situation, the more we distance ourselves from our shadow, the more it will try to take control. Sabotage our lives. This is why many lose control when feeling anger, even over the smallest things.

The necessity of wrath. We can ask ourselves, how do our sins shape us to become better, and allow us to make decisions that sometimes will be considered “evil”?

Evil is among us in this world. Whenever it comes from humans or other environmental and species around us. We all heard that goodwill will always forgive and spare lives, and will never become evil. Evil never forgives or spares lives. So how can good win evil like this? This is where wrath can be used. When evil rises, you must use your wrath against it. Not against yourself or others. Fight to defend. Shed blood to protect. This is where wrath is used as a bad action, performed by a good decision. A good person who has wrath controlled is a man ready for violence when the time calls for it. Good simply can't win here. It will always spare and forgive; evil can never be won like this. You win evil by doing evil.

As part of being a sin to test ourselves as worthy humans in the eyes of the Almighty. We were also meant to be worthy to defend our way of life, whenever evil tries to destroy it. Humans are being tested throughout their lives for being able to control wrath and reflect on their shadows. To use it for a meaningful purpose, rather than an empty one filled with pain, sorrow, and rage.

“A harmless man is not a good man. A good man is a very, very dangerous man who has it under voluntary control.”

Envy

Envy is a rooted sin that is mostly a quiet one. It's not a loud sin that many can see. But it's also a loud one that is very destructive without people realizing it, and others can see it. Envy can have a positive side, though.

The positive that envy could sometimes show is caring. We all know there are people who are jealous of losing their partners, or they might leave for someone else. Some might say it's because they have low self-esteem or are insecure. But here we can see that Envy triggers a response to a loved one. Haven't we all wondered how our partners feel about us? Care about us? A little jealousy shows there is something underneath, even when they never will say it out loud.

The negative side is, when people envy others, they tend to feel bad about themselves, doubt their talents, beliefs, and anything else. This is the quiet one, the one that simply destroys a person from within, causing them emotional damage.

The loud part of the sin is the one that physically, culturally, or even socially impacts a person on a greater level. A person who seeks to copy someone else's life, talents, or interests, in order to seek validation or prove to themselves they are worth the same level as the other person. It leads a person astray from their destined path in life. Why does this happen often? Because in modern society, where success and money are big key factors for survival or a better life, people miss the valuable part where success and money don't really mean famous and rich, but rather happy and financially stable.

Can a person live in a simple house? Can a person live with 50K in his account? How would a mansion change a person's happiness from a simple house? More rooms? More bathrooms? A private maid? Living on 50K may seem low in today's world, and it is. But it depends on a person's lifestyle. Can 50K make someone financially stable to live with? Well, it could be. But maybe not living under any government, and going to live on an island is better. Or living in a very low tax country, that 50K can ease off the trouble.

The loud part of the sin creates a whole new reality for a person. It alters their beliefs, life goals, and time. The quiet one simply affects the person's emotions; if a person can control it and overcome them, they won't become loud enough to lead them astray from their own path.

The problem with envy is that it's easily compared with society norms. If a person wants to be a painter and sell their work independently or sell it to a museum, they can definitely do that. Society, though, does not accept that. You have to be much more than that. You have to read books, become a digital artist, learn modeling software, and Photoshop. Because that is what will make him look like a successful person. Not only a painter, but now a digital artist too. Society looks at this as "growing" and "evolving," and yes, it does in some way. But is it necessary?

Can't someone stick to one profession without evolving or learn new things to do? Will it increase the creative mind? Will it make them smarter? Now this is a tough one to answer, because learning more things can get you new ideas, and enhance your creativity. Unless it's also misunderstood? Learning modeling software is just learning technical skills, not art skills; the same forest landscape idea you drew on paper is the same when you started modeling it. You just have the ability and skills now to create that landscape both on paper and in the software. One might look simple with a pen and brush, while the other is in a digital style.

Creativity is something that everyone has, each in their own different way of thinking or seeing things. Yet people believe that it's necessary to learn more to increase it. As much as it's true, it doesn't have to matter to someone. By default, our brains are wired to constantly learn, even when we don't notice it. So it doesn't matter what we do or don't do, our brains will always find ways to learn new things.

Be good at what you do and how you want to do it in your own way. Be creative as much as your limits allow you. You want to explore new ways to create something, and solve something, then you can increase your learning in that something. But if you're comfortable where you are, have learned all that you need to know, creative enough to create and solve problems, then why push further? Of course, it sounds like degrading you, making you stop, and never pushing forward to be better. On the contrary, it is supposed to guide you to better understand your own needs. Don't chase to be better for others or because you envy their success. Chase your own self-change to be better and your success. Even if it means stopping at one million dollars, while the other person went for five million dollars. But that's where the problem lies. You think you are less worthy or less successful, because you chose to stop at one million and not go for five million. That is where envy destroys you. You let the thought of stopping now that you fail. Your mind is telling you to keep going, earn more, learn more, and evolve more. It's okay not to know everything; no one will ever know everything during their lifetime. Everyone lacks some skill or knowledge of something. You are no different. Our world has placed a standard; don't follow it, follow your own standard. Everything you do, less or more, won't make you less worthy. You are your worst enemy, not the people. It will be hard to see someone gaining more than you, so you will think they are better than you, but they are not. Someone who has leadership skills and you don't, makes them lack a skill or creativity they don't have. Each person has their own path and their own different approaches to success. The one who can achieve happiness is their success.

“A foolish man thinks he knows everything. A wise man knows he doesn't.”

Gluttony is a sin arising from natural human cravings, though it is not biological in the sense of being necessary for survival. Rather than being about the pleasure of eating and drinking, it is an excessive desire for more. A craving that goes beyond basic needs and exists to teach us moderation and generosity.

A person who consumes too much is most likely not to share with others, although we know society norms will require them to behave in a certain way, which will be seen as disrespectful if they do not offer coffee to their fellow co-workers. But in their mind, they don't want to do that. Gluttony forces us to wear masks to hide our true intentions of what we really want to do, or not do. To pretend we are kind and shareable with others. But beneath the surface of our unconscious mind, we want things for ourselves. Now this can relate to all the sins.

Everyone wears a mask to hide their sinful ways. This sin only exposes a global problem caused by our actions, while other sins are mostly kept hidden. What is it? Well, the focus is on a basic need, a thing all humans need to survive. Humans don't consume just for survival; they consume for pleasure, far deeper pleasure than just enjoying a nice meal. By taking too much, you prevent others from gaining their basic needs, which leads to food waste, people starving worldwide, and food shortages. There are over 8 billion people on this planet, and not enough food to feed everyone. It doesn't matter if you took extra to your plate and never touched it; the moment you took it, you craved it, and you lost control over your consumption needs. You're sinning the moment you took it and didn't even consume it. This sin is able to control us without us even noticing it.

Imagine you're going to a 5-star hotel and the hotel cooks 300 eggs for 300 guests, that's one egg for each guest. The moment you took 2, you denied another guest his piece. Or what if the hotel were to inform you that they are going to serve you with one piece only? Would you agree to this?

Would you be okay with accepting less in your meals? No one will agree to this and will not even come back to this hotel ever again. Our sin is secretly lingering in us, telling us to protect it by demanding more. It is considered a standard nowadays that hotels offer an “all you can eat buffet.” So you are defending a standard that has been normalized by society, that this is how hotels should operate. In reality, you are defending your sin, which creates a cycle of harm to others.

By demanding more, you either take from others or you force the business to spend extra money on food. If the hotel could reserve a prepared meal for you where you get one piece of egg, they could save up the extra eggs for another day, and not purchase more.

Gluttony seems to be more of a personal sin, where you can only harm yourself; unlike some sins, this sin can affect others around you. It's not attacking just you; it attacks those around you as well. It's not about the pleasure of eating and drinking; it's about the craving of wanting more.

Gluttony also emphasizes the pleasure of consuming, when you take pleasure in eating or drinking. But is it wrong? Well, we can probably agree that if it's for satisfying your hunger, then it's not sinful. If it's not, then you are sinning in pleasure. But why is it wrong to enjoy consuming if not involved in hunger? Does it make us evil? Does it corrupt our souls in some way? Well, not really.

Based on Christian teaching, it's a way of self-discipline, strength, and faith in the lord. A person who consumes too much will not become evil from it; he will simply be weaker by faith or self-control. It is a road that can lead towards madness, self-destruction, and could slowly, maybe lead towards an evil path.

It is evolving as we continue to create more types of food and drinks. We are forgetting the values that were respected in the past and demanding more and more.

An important question each person can ask themselves is: “How would I act in an apocalyptic world?” Most will probably say they will be the good guys. They will help others, feed the needy ones, and protect the weak. But would they? Remember that people would argue and demand more about anything they can in a normal world, and it's not just about food. If you have ever done it in your life, how can you be so sure your sin won't consume you again? The truth is, we will never know until it happens. It's only when a person enters that state of despair and craving that their true test will emerge to see if they can still preserve their kindness and goodness, or become selfish and evil. As a famous quote said: “Don't make promises when you're happy.” This quote clearly tells us that our emotions can manipulate us; whenever this quote is meant for other subjects, it can also apply here.

“Don't promise when you're happy. Don't reply when you're angry. And don't decide when you're sad.”

~ Ziad K. Abdelnour ~

moreover, we can say: “Don't make promises when you're not hungry.”

Sloth

Sloth is a natural sin that is part of human biology. Sloth is a sin that cannot always be considered a bad thing and a sin. Sloth speaks of the human body and mind with the need for rest, but how much rest is considered sloth?

As the world advances over the centuries, millennia, sloth has evolved and grown along with it. How? It's pretty simple, in today's world, the 20th century, there are computers, robots, servants, cars, automated machines, etc. In the past, those things didn't exist. Humans had to do everything themselves. Basic tasks would take a whole day of work, while today's basic tasks have become automated in a way. 1,000 years ago, a man had to go hunting, build his house, make money, and protect his family. Today, a man only makes money; the rest comes from other people doing it for him, or machines.

Now, can we all agree that this is a good evolution of the human race? Does it make us better humans by removing tasks from our lives so we can focus on others? Shall a man spend years building his own house while working to provide for his family? The answers are not clear, nor are they right or wrong.

A human society that evolves into reducing labor to save on money or workforce is not a bad idea. We can understand that companies do need to make money and not go bankrupt. A smaller workforce is still helpful and useful for some tasks, while the rest are handled by machines. We can pretty much all agree that warfare is a good improvement. Back in the old days, you would read in the history books of battles with over 500,000 deaths. Today, you hear about 10,000 deaths. Modern warfare brought us a change that saves more lives.

So, how does sloth come as a bad thing? Sloth is meant for the self-determination and life-seeking goals. You don't need to build your own house to conquer sloth. You just need to work on your goals in life. Whenever humanity manages to create a solution that helps you not do the required task, it does not mean you are falling into sloth; you still have to put some work into it. It just got easier for you, and that's fine. Humans love to be lazy; they love to take a rest from work, family, anything at all. After all, the Absence of rest can lead to madness and mental breakdown; humans are built in a way that they require rest and time off. There is time for work, chasing your goals, and there is time for rest, relaxation, and alone time. Besides, humans are not cut out to be working all the time; we have seen this in history as many rose against governments or empires and demanded rights, and sometimes, even led to civil wars.

Sloth is a sin that conquers oneself by inflicting self-doubt, delaying goals, quitting, and even just not having passion for anything. It is a battle that is fought every day when a person gets out of bed. There is always that "Just 5 more minutes," "I will do it tomorrow." In the past, a person didn't have this luxury; they had to get up and get their own food, or they would starve, build their own house, or they would have no shelter. It's like they were living in contestant survival mode instead of living.

But in the 20th century, it's not the same; all those risks are gone, we don't need to worry about our food, our shelter, or other things. This is how sloth evolved over the years. In the past, it had little impact on people as they had to provide for themselves; they couldn't stop even if they wanted to. Today it has the biggest impact on people's lives. In the old world, people had more responsibility than today. Think of a man owning a car, he has to keep maintenance on the car once per year. A man in the 18th century owned a horse; he had to feed it, take care of it, keep it healthy, give it shelter, wash it, and so on every day.

Lust

Lust, the one who is the most difficult and hardest sin the human race has to face in their lives, the one that is the hardest to conquer or ever achieve spiritual awakening. Lust comes with the biological necessity of the human race to continue producing future generations. But is lust truly the worst sin? How dangerous can it be? What more does lust teach us other than sexual pleasure?

To begin questioning lust, we first need to understand its biological function. This is a sin that focuses on the human sexual urges to be fulfilled. Similar to gluttony but far more powerful. Its power is deeply rooted inside the human body, unlike gluttony, which is simply awaking hunger or lust for hunger, if we can call it that way.

Gluttony has power over people in the immediate moment, but nothing like how lust has it. Think of a man who buys a whole meal instead of a single sandwich; that's gluttony in action. Lust, on the other hand, works differently. A man watches pornographic content, his mind shuts off, telling himself 5 minutes is enough, which turns into 2 hours long. Even after he fulfilled his sexual desire, lust can be re-awakened again within minutes. I mean, let's face it, which of us didn't want to go another round of sexual pleasure right after the first one? Gluttony acts in one moment and can stop afterward, then the person faces his shame. But lust never stops.

This sin can be considered like a drug, a very powerful, dangerous drug. It's intoxicating the human body and mind that people are getting addicted to it, even if they don't realize it. A man who stops seeking physical sexual pleasure still craves the feeling of it; he just suffers through it like addicts do. Trying to get it out of the system, but lust is not cocaine. It can't just get out of his system. It's part of his system. So when we hear stories of "No NUT November," "I stopped masturbating for one year," "I stopped my porn addiction," they are all pretty much lies. These people say, "I stopped seeking sexual pleasure and I feel better," to what they are really saying: "I stopped masturbating or watching porn, I just go out and date women and sleep with them," or "I stopped masturbating and watching porn, but I suffer through it."

Now, the majority are mostly always go by changing one method with another. Instead of watching porn, they go to a nightclub and flirt with people. There is only a smaller percentage of people who actually conquered or are in the process of conquering it; these individuals are usually spiritual leaders. In the end, everyone is still chasing lust; they just openly share it with others because some forms of it are accepted by society. Calling out that you masturbated 300 times a year does not sound good or courageous thing to say, and will make you look like a loser. But saying you slept with 300 women a year sounds much better; it makes you feel and be treated like a porn star.

Both are chasing lust, it's just one is accepted and welcomed, and encouraged, while the other isn't. People would be surprised to know that, as much as lust is a terrible sin and harmful to human lives by wasting their time and energy, it's actually serving a karma effect here. To make the weak look stronger, and the stronger look weaker. How? Remember that lust is causing the brain to shut off? That is what is happening to most people who chase women. A man decides to stay home and watch pornographic content. He is working 8 hours; he has worked 4 so far and is feeling very stressed. He wants to have a sexual relief moment. He stops the work, goes online, and watches a 10-minute video of pornographic content. Then, when his done, maybe rested for a few minutes, he goes back to work after wasting 30 minutes of his time.

Another man is doing the same. After 4 hours of work, he wants to go out and sleep with a woman. So he gets dressed, showers, puts on cologne, and then heads out to the club. So far, it's been over 15 minutes. Now he flirts with women in the club, buys them drinks, dances with them, eventually he gets lucky with one and goes home with her, they spend the night, and he gets his sexual relief. It's been over 5 hours now. The man wasted half a workday just to get sexual pleasure. So is this the weaker man? Or the stronger, courageous, confident one? You decide.

So what is the moral of these 2 scenarios? Both are surrendering to lust, YES. But one has more control over his mind to waste less time and energy, while the other surrenders completely and is blind to lust conquering him to waste more time, energy, money, and chase the best thing lust can provide, a physical human contact. Think of it like vampires thirsty for blood; one has better self-control, while the other doesn't.

Another way to look at this is selfishness. If a man only seeks sexual pleasure, then he is not interested in a relationship or getting to know the other person. So why bother pretending and lying to the other person you're trying to get into bed with?

What's dangerous about lust is how it shuts off our minds. When our minds are shut off, we make bad decisions and are unable to control ourselves. We think of spending money on pornographic content that costs a lot. Only later to find out it was a scam or not worth anything at all. This explains why many scams happen on pornographic sites. Scammers know people are not thinking when visiting those sites and are consumed by lust. A perfect chance to scam them.

Now that we can see most of what lust really does to a person in harmful or wasteful ways. Does lust have any positive side to it? Well, it gives us LOVE, but it depends on who you ask if they can see it in a positive way. Lust and love are almost identical in how they make a person feel. When you are in love, you feel both lust and love; when you love a parent, it's love with the absent of lust. But not really. Lust is always beneath the surface of love; it's just being suppressed or becoming dormant by a person's perspective or emotions. So when a son hugs his mother, he does not feel lust, only love, but a hug is a physical contact, and it can be lustful. Our mind is wired to understand different situations and act and feel accordingly. This is how lust stays out of it, or it's there, but not felt. Breastfeeding can be a more obvious situation when a mother feeds her baby, to breastfeeds her husband.

Lust and love could possibly be the same thing. They both could be considered as one, but can be split into 2 different things. So we can understand that love is not a separate emotion or chemical reaction from lust. It's coming from lust within and becomes something beautiful for us to see and accept.

“Love is society’s excuse for nudity.”

One more important thing to think about is the motives of a person in a relationship.

For a man, it can be easy access to sexual pleasure at any given time, for free 24/7. For a woman, it can be security and financial stability. This can mean that many men and women out there are not really in a relationship out a love. But more of a self-motive.

Greed

Greed, the one that was created by humanity. By nature, we are naturally born with 6 deadly sins. Humans invented a new one to add to the list. Some would argue that greed is naturally born within humans. But let's investigate.

So, how come greed has been introduced into our lives? We first have to go back to the days of BCE and earlier to understand it. In those eras, money hadn't been invented yet. So how did people become greedy? Well, people would go for goods of any kind that existed. Things like food, land, power, and women. A person in that time would be judged as greedy for taking more possessions of items, territory, and people rather than coins. It can also be tied to how greedy people behave, both same to the past and in modern times. This does not change, for a man who takes more, he cannot stop from fulfilling his needs or desires. A billionaire today would buy 50 houses in 50 different countries. A king in 12 BC would take a whole continent to build his empire. Different “currencies”, same behaviors.

In the time before currency came to exist, humans would mostly be seen acting under mixed sins, gluttony, envy, and lust. Why is that? Because currency today is only a conduit to something else. Money in itself is useless; you can't eat it, and you definitely can't sleep with it. It's a tool for us to reach our true desires and needs. Humans only gave it the value of purchase. People of the BC era would go directly to the item or person they wanted. Today, you gain currency through salary, lottery, and loans. Then purchase your desired item or person.

Prostitution in ancient times involved sexual services being exchanged for food, shelter, or protection. Today, they're bought with money. The transaction hasn't changed; the conduit has. In some cultures, like ancient Mesopotamia, they would do it as part of a ritual. Some of the old era values still exist today. Patronage and protection are considered a way for a man to provide for a woman, and she, in return, would provide sexual intimacy. Resources for intimacy.

Greed, in its definition, is associated with the promotion of personal or family survival, and it may at the same time be an intent to deny or obstruct competitors from potential means. It's only that after thousands of years, greed has evolved mainly to be looked at in financial terms. Today, most people will see greed as the means for more money rather than the goods.

In the past, it was more obvious to see a person going for more meat, so it was gluttony. Or if he went for more women, then it's lust. In the modern day, a person would go on gaining a lot of money, big salaries, loans, lottery, and even scamming others to then use it to purchase the things he want. You can probably look at it as a double sin. You are sinning for the lust of a woman's sexual pleasure, but also you are sinning for the greed of making more money than you need to. This is not exactly about gaining more money than you need to pay for the sexual services of a woman, although in some cases, it does.

Two ways of looking at it are that a man who seeks 1 million to live happily would reach that, but then continue for more. On the other hand, a person who makes 2K a month wishes to purchase the sexual services of a woman, whose price is 1K. Here we can see the man is forced to work extra hours or in more jobs to gain more money, both for himself and for the service he has to spend a lot on. In the second scenario, we can clearly see how greed mixed with lust can damage a person's life, as he wastes more money that could be used for improving his future or financial status. In the first scenario, is it merely just greed, and the inability to stop when you can.

In summary, is greed really born within ourselves? Or was it invented to strengthen our other sins further and only to be used as a conduit to what we really want? Do we commit 2 sins at once today, then in the BC era? Where someone would sin once, while we sin with purchase? Currency in itself has no potential need for humans; it can only be used to purchase what you want, for a price. In the BC era, people would trade items, goods, and possibly even sexual services. So people would lose some of their possessions to get something they need or want. In modern day, our possessions are mostly secured and safe with us, while we use currency to safely purchase more. If we remove the purchase away, that food, drinks, sex, and shelter are free, currency has no more value, and we return to just trading with our goods. If we look at it in a way, this may be how greed was in the old era. People who wanted more meat were forced to give some away to trade for clothes, materials, and such.

Now we don't need to worry about it today. Because greed evolved to become in our currency. Provide us with the safety of gaining more goods without losing what we currently have. Money doesn't erase greed; it amplifies it, making us sin more efficiently.

Conclusion

Some sins evolve with civilization. In the past, they were raw and obvious, but limited. Today, they are subtle, abstract, and multiplied. Was the old world harsher, or was it simply purer? I guess it's a question each person can ask themselves.
